everything and made it public," said Fulbright, chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

But he added that his proposal has a possible drawback "finding it out surreptitiously is the only way it's credible" to intelligence agents.

He commented to newsmen in connection with a detailed list of what his committee terms unanswered questions about the seizure of the United States intelligence ship Pueblo.

But the Senate Democratic leader, Senator Mansfield, a committee member, said, "I have the very strong belief the administration has given the committee every bit of information it has."

The committee's questions were addressed to Dean Rusk, Secretary of State, by letter. Much of the material in the answer will be classified a committee spokesman said.

The committee questions include:

"Why is it necessary to send a ship so close to the territorial waters of another state in order to collect intelligence information?"

"What aircraft were available for possible response to the attack? What military commanders made the decision not to send available aircraft to the aid of the Pueblo?"

Rusk was asked to answer "at the earliest possible time."

Fulbright Suggests Intelligence Pooling

Washington, Feb. 6 (AP) — Senator Fulbright suggested today that the United States and Russia simply exchange intelligence information each now gathers at great effort and expense with ships and planes.

"It would save us both a lot of money if we quit hiding
